Preview Q2 – present business likely better than sentiment - for now

While the sentiment of the German furniture industry as Surteco's most important customer group is depressed since the war in the Ukraine began, the actual business was probably still solid levels. Against that backdrop, we expect Surteco to report solid top line growth for Q2 on July 29th, but also an ongoing high inflationary pressure from raw materials. All in, we believe that Surteco is on course to meet its EBIT guidance of EUR 55-65m for 2022, but the final result might be more at the lower end of that range. Buy, PT EUR 40.

Business expectations in negative territory

While representatives of the German furniture industry perceive the current state of business as still "good" by now, business expectations have fallen off a cliff in March 2022 after the outbreak of hostilities between the Ukraine and Russia and did not recover since then. Obviously, the industry expects a recession in the near future. At the same time, raw material cost pressure for Surteco remains high.

Q2 should see still solid top line growth but ongoing cost pressure

Against that backdrop, we expect Surteco to report still solid top line growth of around 3% for Q2 on July 29th, mainly driven by price increases. We anticipate an ongoing high inflationary pressure from raw materials in Q2, leading to materials costs of still around 51% of revenues. All other cost ratios should be largely in-line with the levels seen in the last couple of quarters, we think.

Guidance for 2022 should be reach

We believe that Surteco is on course to meet its EBIT guidance of EUR 55-65m for 2022, but the actual result might be more at the lower end of that range. On the contrary, the revenue guidance of EUR 730-750m for 2022 could even turn out to be a bit conservative as we expect Surteco to have realized revenues of more than EUR 400m after H1 already.

Our view on Q2

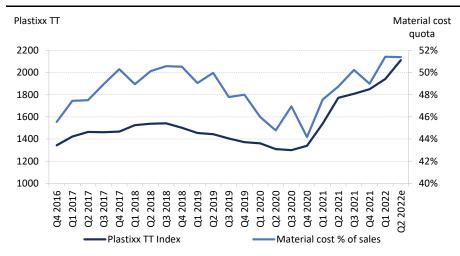

Ifo business climate index for the German furniture industry

Source: VDM, Pareto Securities

While representatives of the German furniture industry perceive the current state of business as still "good" by now, business expectations have fallen off a cliff in March 2022 after the outbreak of hostilities between the Ukraine and Russia and did not recover since then. Obviously, the industry expects a recession in the near future.

Raw material costs at record levels

Source: Kiweb.de, Pareto Securities

At the same time, raw material cost pressure remains high, as exemplified by the Plastixx TT index depicted above, which proved to be a good lead indicator for the development of Surteco's material cost quota in the past.

Against that backdrop, we expect Surteco to report solid top line growth of around 3% for Q2 on July 29th, mainly driven by price increases, aiming at passing through the cost inflation incurred by Surteco. We anticipate an ongoing high inflationary pressure from raw materials in Q2, leading to materials costs of still around 51% of revenues. All other cost ratios should be largely in-line with the levels seen in the last couple of quarters, we think.

Consequently, we believe that Surteco is on course to meet its EBIT guidance of EUR 55-65m for 2022, albeit the actual result might be more at the lower end of that range. On the contrary, the revenue guidance of EUR 730-750m for 2022 might even turn out to be a bit conservative as we expect Surteco to have realized revenues of more than EUR 400m after H1 already (see below).
